

TOBIN MILLER SHEARER

A child of God who has baked a lot of pies, once hustled out of the path of a grizzly bear, and been called one of the country's "most dangerous professors" for his work on dismantling racism, Tobin Miller Shearer now lives on a slice of wooded land just south of Elkhart, Indiana, with his partner of 40 years (Cheryl), their three cats (Hocus, Pocus, and Sunny), one dog (Pauli), and the occasional skunk. He has also written seven books, hundreds of articles, and founded two non-profits. Much of his life has focused on the question of how God's people can confront real world issues while staying joyful, curious, and faithful. He currently serves as the Director of Enrollment at Anabaptist Mennonite Biblical Seminary (which means he is the main cheerleader for an amazing group of professors and staff people who prepare leaders to serve the church).
